

April is expected to be a very exciting month!

We start with a workshop...

Kinesthetic Grammar: Activities for engaging language learning!

Are the body and mind connected? And if so, can the body help the brain remember and process information? Research suggests that yes movement does aid cognitive function. In two separate studies, younger students who were taught to use a gesture performed better on math tests, and college students who used gestures were better able to recall the details of a narrative. Add to this multiple studies about the effects of exercise and blood flow to the brain, and it makes sense that we might engage the body more fully in learning environments.

The next question is how. How can we use embodied learning, which include the senses and vocalizations, emotions and movement to enhance learners' developing language? In this virtual workshop, participants will experience different grammar-focused activities that involve a kinesthetic approach to language practice. After experiencing these activities as learners, participants will discuss ways to adapt them for other structures and possibilities for extending them into broader communicative projects

Saturday, 3 April 2021, 17.00 - 18.00. Only four seats available!
When they are taken, we will announce a second date.
